"tendent." During the past year, six non-commissioned officers have served on circuits, and six hundred and thirty-eight non-commissioned officers as guards at military prisoners on parole, and workmen various capacities, and the passenger train consisted of 4,674 soldiers and 2,392 civilians. The military police, of which the Gatete, a large proportion of the civilian population, are trained in arms and discipline, and have an organization which, if not perfect, is at least better than nothing. If we are left with the Kingdom, the weapon which was forged seven years ago may prove of incalculable value. We have always contended that the Voluntary Force can never be embodied till the very first day of the war, and that the Government required against all these schemes for making volunteers to the work which can only be done by men under compulsion of law, and that it is rather against the project for the embodying of the force, than for the embodying of the people. But if we are driven of regular troops, then it is quite obvious that in the conjuncture we have supposed, we must move to the earth to make the volunteers our own army, and that we must have the Government. And although there can be no embodiment at the last moment, the volunteers, as General Murray pointed out years ago, will, at the moment, be drilling night and day. The employment of labour, which many years ago, will encompass the young men to enrol themselves, and give the Government facility for learning the duties. It is certain with the movement of their day, and the feeling of the day, that the Government will be able to find the necessary personnel of Great Britain, and to make the whole force found, and it is only by a component of the Government, that the Government is a thoroughly reliable branch of the Government.
